I've recently just finished reading the book "The Computer and The Brain" by John Von Neumann. A brilliant physicist, he contributed a great many things to quantum mechanics, economics, and computer science. The book that he wrote was his opinions and observations on the differences between hardware of the digital computers that had at the time, only recently began being developed and the biological "wetware" that was the brain.

Here I'm going to talk about some major points that I thought were interesting in the book, as well as a comparison
